Throughout the twentieth century, American courts have generally declined to recognize the category of hate speech as an exception to free speech rights under the First Amendment.

Fischer, American Historical Review, "Drawing on new evidence from archives seems foolish for any thinking historian, in the past or present, to argue for such a thing. They all share the worldview that rejects enlightenment epistemology, opposes progressive historicism, and harbors a deep disenchantment for the liberal state and, by implication, for constitutional recognition of racial and religious equality."
