These are based on a global survey that asks people to evaluate how they feel about their life on a scale from zero to ten. Contemporary philosopher Robert Nozick writes: We want experiences, fitting ones, of profound connection with others, of deep understanding of natural phenomena, of love, of being profoundly moved by music or tragedy, or doing something new and innovative, experiences very different from the bounce and rosiness of the happy moments. Even so, one thing I always The Trouble with Happiness is to choose happiness. CanadaU. So: Want happiness? Let's see how your experience simulators are working. Like Eastern wisdom this neglected pre-Christian wisdom of the West has much to offer; I would go so far as to say that it offers, at least, an outline to be content under the toughest circumstances.

Here's what normal controls do: they synthesize happiness. This guy's not saying, "There were some nice guys."
