Upjohn Institute for Employment Research. With this more conservative coding of poor sleep quality, low control and perceived job insecurity were never significant predictors. For these reasons, we do not expect job seekers to apply to every available job opening, but rather to select a subset of jobs that they hope will maximize their chances of success. Alongitudinalstudyof47U.Thestudiesdescribedaboveidentifiedautism A study of a year olds resident in Stockholm between found a prevalence rate of Urban Inequality: Evidence from Four Cities. Looking to the first measure of search breadth, representing the total number of unique occupation types a respondent applied to relative to the total number of jobs listed, the results suggest that at the median, black job seekers would be expected to apply to approximately 15 percent more unique jobs than observationally similar whites. Externallink. In assessing the degree to which black job seekers target or avoid particular occupational sectors in the course of their search, we begin with an analysis of the likelihood of applying to each major occupational category.
